SEATTLE—Electricity was in the air as over 60 local, national and international galleries descended upon CenturyLink Field Stadium for the inaugural Seattle Art Fair opening night Preview party on July 30, 2015. Co-produced by Art Market Productions and Paul Allen’s company, Vulcan, Inc., the art fair is Seattle’s opening bid to become a destination of scale for art enthusiasts and collectors.

Max Fishko of Art Market Productions has gauged Seattle as fruitful grounds for growing into this role. “Seattle’s an amazing place,” he said. “There’s an incredible art scene that is especially welcoming. There’s great art, there’s great dealers, there’s great museums so all of that adds up to a ripe opportunity to come in and do something great in a city where great things are sort of possible.”

Over 4,000 people filtered through the fair with sales reported across a range of price points, according to Art Market Productions.

Over a dozen Seattle galleries are represented in the fair including Greg Kucera Gallery, Winston Wachter Fine Art (New York/Seattle) and Platform Gallery. At the preview, Jim Wilcox of Greg Kucera Gallery liked the way the Seattle Art Fair was unfolding.

“It’s just like what you would want an opening of an art fair to be like, a lot of people thrilled to be here,” said Wilcox. “What’s the best part about being here? The excitement of curious new collectors.”

In addition to witnessing the excitement of opening night—and being part of it—was the idea artwork was getting seen by a wide range of people from Seattle and beyond.

“Sometimes you just need to be in the presence of the artwork to appreciate what you’re seeing,” said Wilcox. “With the fair, the people in Seattle get to see the artwork that comes to them and the fair exposes us to the people who come, just to see, this conglomeration of artwork all at once.”

The Seattle Art Fair preview raised over $85,000 for Artist Trust, according to the art fair. The non-profit organization is dedicated to supporting Washington State artists working across all disciplines through artist grants and professional development training programs.
